

COSMIC IDENTITY

This document addresses your cosmic identity. This is a continued study in the wholeness of an individual.

Every day, every person has a Galactic Signature. There are 260 unique possibilities! Each signature is a combination of a "Tribe" and a "Tone." The energy on the day you were born is known as your personal Galactic Signature and serves as a key to your Cosmic Identity. Your Cosmic Identity is the larger synchronic order of your life's journey or the multi-dimensional design of your journey.

Our Cosmic Identity is our soul's unique spiritual identity that exists in perpetuity. Our Cosmic Identity is our inquiry into our origination identity, our universal identity and our human aspects and behaviors that transcends borders and categorizations. Cosmic Identity studies the patterns that form the building blocks of the natural world, the Galaxies, the Cosmos and the relationship between our human body to the cosmos.

Our experience of cosmic identity has essentially been lost. We can say this, because human beings fell under the unconscious asleep of the physical conscious mind. The physical human exists at a matter conscious level where they don't belong, and they experience all sorts of traumatic dreams in that unconscious condition of physical matter. Our human identity is constantly trying to validate its existence, because the validity of physical matter is invalid; because it can't be validated. Our Human identity is maintained from generation to generation, and each generation passes away. This is the way that human identity sees things.

The waking up is the point of the cosmic identity. We are not excluded from the wholeness of the Universe. Instead, we are constantly participating in the Universe with our cosmic identity. We become aware that there is a vast whole, a vast whole that moves in its own natural rhythms and for its own created purposes. In yielding to the movement of the rhythms, the cosmic rhythms that are present, we begin to recognize that they are present and we are part of them. We had no room for them before because we were wrapped up in the physical human identity. It changes when we realize that we must take the human identity apart, open ourselves to introspection, yield to the changes that must be made, and receive a new awareness as being a part of an immense whole. If we have any individual meaning it is based in the fact that we are functioning and operating within that immense whole, that immense cosmic whole.

The Earthly affairs of our human identity in which we all play a certain part are permeated by the cosmic rhythms and the cosmic purposes. We remember that it must be a thoughtform before it can become a created form. Having said that, we must remember nothing gets into human affairs without the thoughtform created coming through human beings.

Our Cosmic Identity is the "I AM". Think about it, as our cosmic identity, alignment, attunement, with cosmic rhythms and purposes is restored, then whatever we do in our daily living will be permeated by this cosmic expression, the expression of the creative process, but brought to focus now through the physical human being. This purpose is to bring this to focus, to let the planet and all things related to the planet be brought specifically and directly into the focus of the creative process by reason of human thought.

Our awakening begins to share a willingness to relinquish our human identity and all its expectations, all its intentions, all its ambitions, so as to make space for the living experience of our cosmic identity. Human beings in their human identity satisfy themselves with their beliefs, their religions, their political systems, all the rest of it. And all these things are in conflict with each other, just as human beings are in conflict individually.

Our Cosmic identity, being the natural state is our true state and is the “All is one”. This is the state of wholeness. Our Cosmic Identity is the existent state everywhere in the universe except in the human identity, because of the intransigence (inflexibility or narrow-mindedness) of human beings. In relinquishing our intransigence, we willingly yield our human identity to be dissolved, and we find that when there is that willingness something else begins to come into the picture, something that was totally excluded before. Because it has been totally excluded, human beings imagined that it didn’t exist. But giving space for it, we find that it is there, and we find that there is a cosmic identity, individually and all together. It is one identity, differentiated in natural and harmonious ways.

We are capable of recognizing spiritual creative endeavors in every aspect of living, wherever we find ourselves. We recognize the same principles at work. There are creative impulses often articulated by other individuals, our spiritual mentors, if you will, and such impulses are then amplified by their colleagues at the time, and eventually by us; individually and collectively. This is the way in which we perceive the world.

This brings up an interesting point, which is intrinsic to the creative design of which we are part. There is something to be created by the collective whole that is larger than one individual. There is an evident fact that there are more people on earth than just one. With our mental capacities we can certainly imagine different universes in which on each planet there is one being that takes care of everything. But, that is not so here. There is clearly more than one needed. We create as individuals in a collective context.

So, in many ways we recognize ourselves as an expression of divine and cosmic identity. “Divine” indicates something beyond our physical mental constructs, and “cosmic” indicates a vast context outside our human identity. The task of the day is not to rehash that this is what we are about, but rather to provide a living, practical demonstration of our deep knowledge of that true cosmic identity, expressed in whatever is on our plate; hour by hour, day by day.

By design, we are multi-dimensional beings. Each of us is a living link between spirit and matter. We are all Planetary Citizens and Cosmic Citizens. Your Cosmic Self is a higher dimensional expression of who you are. We all have gifts that we are meant to share. Some flow from us naturally, while others we have to cultivate.

As a deeper spiritual truth emerges in your mind, as a bright light dissolves the shadows in a darkened room, you realize that your soul is just borrowing your family lineage for this one lifetime. Your identity does not originate in your family tree, and so you will have to look beyond the family tree for your true cosmic identity.

Ponder this....early on your attention was focused on your past lives, for perhaps they could be considered as pathways to your cosmic identity. Naturally, you are influenced by all your past experiences, and so that seems to be the next likely place to search. But which lifetime defines your cosmic identity? Is it possible that any one of your lifetimes holds the key to your cosmic identity? You’ve had many thousands of experiences through your lifetimes. If you pick one lifetime to define you, why would you pick that one? If it was a preferred lifetime, does that mean that the other lifetimes that were not quite so interesting had no value? Not likely — every lifetime has learning opportunities that have made you what you are today — they contributed to your cosmic identity.

Those who are preoccupied with getting their cosmic identity from one particularly notable past life are doing so as a way of compensating for their lack of a clear identity in this current lifetime. But would there even be a need for compensating if you recognized your true essential nature? After all, if you are made of the essence of the infinite divine creator, why would that splendid cosmic substance need to be compensated for?

If you need to compensate for something, and if it is not your spiritual essence that you are compensating for, then what is happening here? Could it be that your spiritual essence is something you know about as an idea, rather than a reality? This is a typical situation, because you are generally given ideas about spiritual reality, rather than methods for attaining states of direct knowing. As Chaldai, we teach both process and method.

Ideas can inspire, but they are rather like a painting — you can look at a painting and get grand ideas as you let it inspire you, but you recognize that you are not living in the painting. A beautiful painting is merely suggesting noble possibilities for you. And this is likely what has happened with your sense of self. You have a grand idea — a painting, so to speak — that you are a divine being, but then your attention is brought back to the realities of your daily life.

Your reality includes your body and its challenges, your many feelings and thoughts that you experience moment to moment, and your life circumstances, in all their imperfections. Well, if that is what you are referring to when you consider your cosmic identity, then it is no wonder that some people are driven to see their cosmic identity as a famous past-life notable. Of course, for some reason, the people who are actually amazing beings in another dimension seem to have regrettably little access to their other-dimensional splendor, which must greatly perturb them when they look at the endless petty annoyances of their life. And this suggests that this other-dimensional secret identity is yet another way to compensate for a deeper sense of true identity that has gone missing.

Now it may be that there is a limitation in language when you explore the topic of cosmic identity, and that is always an issue with making sense of metaphysical matters. After all, if cosmic identity suggests something that can be shown in a picture, or described in words, then that could be a source of your confusion. For example...

If you are not defined by your family or ancestors,

If you are not defined by your past lives,

And if you are not defined by your existence in any other dimension,

Well then, perhaps you could be defined by a specific uniquely personal characteristic. But which characteristic will you pick? And why? Once you are so defined, will you be trapped within a narrow definition? You are much more than a word in the dictionary, and you deserve more than a simple verbal definition.

Would you choose a particular trait to describe your cosmic identity that seems to define your main focus or interest? This might be a worthwhile exploration, at least in defining your values in life, and such things can be useful to know. However, even when you have a list of your highest values, your cosmic identity still remains hidden. This is because traits, values, beliefs, preferences, and any other qualities that may seem to describe you only refer to you the physical human, but even with an extensive list, you still haven't touched your cosmic spiritual identity.

What if you knew that your soul had a special mystical name? You could get a psychic reading revealing your spiritual name, or you could get an aura painting of your soul. These types of readings may well show you something about how a psychic perceives your energy, and these interpretations may help you tune into your essence more easily...

Or not, because if you take them too literally, you are just getting stuck in the same trap that comes from thinking that you are only one trait, one family, one lifetime, or one anything. It seems, then, that psychic interpretations of your soul, though perhaps helping to reveal aspects of your inner nature, are not really showing you your cosmic identity.

So why bother to name the ways that won't help you uncover your cosmic identity? When you look at what doesn't lead you there, you can examine how you have unconsciously defined yourself in false and limiting ways. Throughout your whole life, you have been defining yourself through these influences: your family, your peers, society in general, the mass media, and all the situations in your life.

You have been building your own internal identity file, with thousands of decisions about your identity, year after year. You have been accumulating decisions about your identity every day, and many of these early decisions were made when you were young. Your internal file also includes assessments that other people have made about you and your unique inner values. You never had a chance to question whether you wished to be included in their definitions of reality. For example:

*Television commercials that define happy people as those who use particular products,
Movies that define successful people as living or behaving in a particular way,
Friends and family who can't help questioning you when your thoughts or beliefs go outside the limits of their understanding,
Co-workers, employers, and employees who have their own culture, and who see you in a particular way, compared to their understanding of reality.*

All these influences affect your ability to tune into your cosmic identity, because your cosmic identity is more subtle than anything that can be described in words — by you, or by anyone else. And that gives you a clue about why you have been seeking your cosmic identity along the wrong paths. You were looking for something that fit into a word, a concept, or something tangible. When you can name it, and see it, such as a family influence, or such as a trait, or a particular lifetime, it is not your true identity.

All these influences are simply that, influences, but not identities. And while you shouldn't entirely discount influences, they are not your cosmic identity. This is because your cosmic spiritual identity cannot be named, and so any attempts to define it, as if your cosmic identity were a word in the dictionary, puts you on a path that doesn't lead to your cosmic identity.

When you are told that you are a soul, and that your soul is divine, then you think that you have information about your cosmic self. Unfortunately, as valid as these spiritual concepts may be — as ideas — they are only referring to truths that can really be known when you access them as inwardly felt states.

Your cosmic identity is accessed through a felt state. But what is that? Wouldn't it be easier to just define it, in words, so that you can have the definition, and know, finally, just what your identity is? Well, it doesn't work that way, because any such definition doesn't refer to the real you. And if such definitions don't really refer to your real self, in your real life, what do you do?

You will have to bring your attention to something that will give you a hint of your cosmic identity — a felt sense within you that cannot be defined in words, or depicted in a picture.

Now of course, your felt state changes from moment to moment, and that may seem to be a problem when you are looking to define your cosmic spiritual identity. Actually, if you are shifting from moment to moment, then your cosmic identity is shifting too. And there is nothing wrong with that. And yet, it seems rather troublesome, at least for some people, when they recognize that they are shifting, because they suppose that they are going to melt away. But they won't...

When you recognize that you are shifting from moment to moment, you start to play with that, and you realize, to your delight, that there is something consistent throughout your shifting experiences. And that means that you are not melting away, and it means that you are not wildly fluctuating. These subtle shifts are rather like the gentle changes that take place from moment to moment within a natural setting, such as a forest.

The wind blowing through the trees causes the trees to gently sway, but the trees are not being uprooted by the breeze. And the pine needles are swaying in the breeze, and all the pine needles are swaying at their own pace. And yet, though the thousands of pine needles are each moving in their own way, there is a deeper harmony in their movement. And this deeper order gives you a hint about your own cosmic identity.

You are more like the forest, and less like the pine needle. Of course, at times, you may feel like a pine needle drifting amidst the forest of the universe, and at those times you can bring your attention to the forest that you are. And no, this is not to say that your cosmic identity is a forest, so don't get stuck there. Remember, you aren't a simple definition. You are an experience, comprising many aspects, all referenced to, and expressing, a deep universal order.

That is important — you are an experience. Even better — you are the one who experiences each moment. Let yourself follow the path of that realization. But what are you experiencing? You are experiencing this moment as it evolves into the next moment. And that movement, as it evolves, tells you something about your cosmic identity. But when you try to label it, or fix it in amber, or put it in words, it all becomes nonsense.

That is because you can't define your cosmic identity. That's the trap, because any attempt to define it pulls you ever farther from your cosmic identity. And so if you can't define it, how can you ever know your cosmic identity?

How does the forest know that it is the forest? It experiences its forest-like qualities from moment to moment. And that means that it is present, having its forest experience as it ever evolves. It has all the experiences that comprise being a forest, without having to name any particular one as defining the cosmic forest identity.

And of course, you aren't a forest, but you can learn from a forest. You are having experiences from moment to moment. But can you let the words describing these experiences release from your consciousness? Probably not, at least not entirely. So the words and concepts will be there, but they aren't your cosmic identity.

And the ideas about what you are will be there too, but the ideas aren't your cosmic identity. Not that your ideas are invalid, because they are likely interesting and perhaps even useful ideas that you could use in a number of ways. So you note the ideas, but you do not become immersed in them as sources for discovering your cosmic identity.

This leaves you with your non-verbal experience, in its ever-evolving flow from moment to moment. And what you experience there, leaving out the words, the ideas, and the definitions, reveals your cosmic identity. I can't tell you how you should interpret your experience, because once I do so, it becomes something that isn't your cosmic identity.

So you can be present with your cosmic identity, from moment to moment, but there is nothing much else that you can say about it. And if you try, you may well create some wonderful poetry or beautiful paintings, and you may inspire people with your insights and visions, and this would be wonderful. But it wouldn't reveal your cosmic identity.

If you want to experience your cosmic identity, you have to be present and notice what is happening within you. And once you think you have it, it evolves again. And yet again. That is all your cosmic identity knows how to do.

So be present with it. And breathe it into your body and heart and mind — because this moment will never come again. And now, the moment is slipping away. But look, here is another one...That is the essence of your cosmic identity. It is the quantum intelligence of your cosmic identity.
