

WHITE MIRROR

Wavespell:

White Mirror represents the Hall of Mirrors, where you can face your own reflection and see the truth about yourself. As a mirror, White Mirror merely reflects what is, whether truth, beauty or illusion. Here you can face unfinished business, the dissonance of difficulties, or charged issues that would keep you from the full expression of your Divinity. Become aware of any illusions or distortions within yourself; your clarity of perception will transform them. Take a moment to see yourself as you actually are, shadow and all, freed from the maze of mental illusion.

The world is the mirror for you to truly see. Any strong reaction to a person or event signals an issue to work on in yourself. Be willing to examine and utilize what you see in your mirrors, in order to transform dysfunctional belief systems, negative thoughtforms, and fixed patterns.

White Mirror's action – its direction in life – is to reflect. The wording is either literal – ‘I am another yourself’ – or figurative, as we ponder, take a serene moment to both remember the past and anticipate the future. A White Mirror does have the interesting karma of moving through the world shining people’s behaviors back at them, but also reflects the spark of light within them that they themselves may have felt was lost. A distorted mirror makes the reflection unwieldy or unrecognizable, but the clear mirror – from still water instead of troubled or murky – shows another the truth of themselves they may have no vantage point to detect. The more we calm ourselves, the clearer the portrait is for another to view. And likewise, the stillness we hold is the stillness that will surface within them.

White Mirror's power – its offering to strengthen us in turn – is endlessness. Much of the White Mirror's prophecy reads like a transcendent hallucination. Imagining mirrors reflecting each other – into infinity – offers a dizzy disorientation where nothing is really in danger except our mental control or ability to conceive of such endlessness. This is a journey that many choose through hallucinogens, or under the guidance of a shaman. The original Mayan sacrifice was this level of psychic transformation – for the priest, the victim and the gathered populace. It was an invocation of the Universal Sources whose direct energy feed pulsed all into a trance-state, into transcendence. The endlessness of White Mirror undulates between the ego’s struggle with losing dominion – an endless tug of war between resistance and surrender – and the ecstatic state that arises when that conflict between will and essence subsides. The endlessness is what essence is – a soul life that never stops. When we attain this within our human experience, we are liberated from fear of death and all its nuances, are free from the idea that there is ever an ending.

White Mirror has the essence of order, and this refers to the Mayan ceremonial hierarchy. In White Mirror moments, there is a divine source acknowledged by all – the one to whom the temple was erected towards. There is the priest, endowed with a resilient channel to the sun itself, who wields the blade and frees the heart. There is the chosen victim – often a royal child or the victor of a battle or ball game, rather than the serf or defeated warrior – painted blue to invoke the dreaming night, the crossing through physicality to ether. There is then those not holy enough to rise to heaven in this enchantment, the crowd below who can only hope for such ascension.

White Mirror is antipodal, opposite to Yellow Star. Yellow Star honors Venus, and the powerful beauty it gleams. For men, Venus is an invitation to hold the beauty of power – warriorship, masculine strength and determination, fearlessness – and for women, it is the power of beauty – that making our hearts shine through to our skin pores, our tresses, is to be a flower or gemstone in the world, a shimmering light for the men to return home to. White Mirror is beyond gender roles or distinctions of beauty, assaults our human perfection frailty both with its blade. We need Yellow Star – the reference of beauty – to counterbalance the ugliness or cruelty of the sacrifice ceremony. But then the ritual itself shows the luminescence of life force – essence again, that Yellow Star within every one of us. White Mirror reveals that the sparkle in the sky is a reflection of our own spark inside.

White Mirror is analogous, supported by Red Dragon. The birth represented by Red Dragon, the primordial vessel or womb from which we all emerge, is part of the death depicted in human sacrifice. The hole left by our absent heart is regenerative, bathed in blood and ready to hold new life. Red Dragon, as the space in utero, needs a different sort of sacrificial act – the severing of an infant from its mother to enter oxygenated independence. Red Dragon people can feel the White Mirror moment as a means to actually complete a birth cycle and double their nurturance from being sustained by solely mother, to both maternal and paternal influences: again the sacrificial loss is ultimately only exponential liberation.

White Mirror has a mystical, occult relationship to Blue Night. The Blue Night indication of our home, the house that shelters us to sleep deeply enough for sweet dreams, always holds the decorative mirror that lets us see ourselves within this sanctuary. In open air, we might catch our reflection in windows or water, but in the security of our home we take longer views to coif or simply realize our physical form. We place ourselves in the dream of life, see the film of ourselves instead of always standing distantly behind the camera. This is part of the holism of endlessness, that we are part of reality and not separate from it, seamlessly interwoven. White Mirror serves the occult empowerment of Blue Night by making dreams a softer sacrifice ceremony. We don’t have to actually climb the temple stairs and be assaulted in faith. Our dreams take us there imaginally, offset the ego’s dominance, and allow us the liberation of an ascended life – all in the hours of a night’s sleep.
